The dainty woman with the child-like face cut the string, when, lo! there darted forth four hissing, venomous vipers. Two of the reptiles struck, biting her white wrist ere she could withdraw, and an hour later, her face swollen out of all recognition, she died in terrible agony. The betrayal of Bulgaria and the assassination of Petkoff, the patriot, have, indeed, been swiftly avenged. CHAPTER VII THE SIGN OF THE CATS-PAW Another part which the Prince played in the present-day drama now being enacted in Eastern Europe brought him in touch with The Sign of the Cats-Paw, a sign hitherto unknown to our Foreign Office, or to readers of the daily newspapers. At the same time, however, it very nearly cost him his own life. The affair occurred about a couple of months after the death of the fascinating Olga Steinkoff. He had been sent back to the Balkans upon another mission. Cosmopolitan of cosmopolitans, he had been moving rapidly up and down Europe gathering information for Downing Street, but ever on the look-out for an opening for the Parson and himself to operate in a very different sphere. Garrett, blindly obedient to the telegrams he received, had taken the car on some long flying journeys, Vienna, Berlin and back to Belgrade, in Servia. For two months or so I had lost sight of both the mild-mannered, spectacled Clayton and the Prince, when one morning, while walking down St. James Street, I saw Garrett in his grey and scarlet livery driving the car from Piccadilly down to Pall Mall. By this I guessed that his Highness had returned to London, so I called at Dover Street, and twenty minutes later found myself seated in the big saddle-bag chair with a &quo...
